

PROJECT MUSE®

Diasporas in Modern Societies: Myths of Homeland and Return

William Safran

Diaspora: A Journal of Transnational Studies, Volume 1, Number 1,
Spring 1991, pp. 83-99 (Article)

Published by University of Toronto Press
DOI: 10.1353/dsp.1991.0004

➔ For additional information about this article

<http://muse.jhu.edu/journals/dsp/summary/v001/1.1.safran.html>

Diasporas in Modern Societies: Myths of Homeland and Return

William Safran
University of Colorado, Boulder

1. Minorities, Aliens, and Diasporas: The Conceptual Problem

In most scholarly discussions of ethnic communities, immigrants, and aliens, and in most treatments of relationships between minorities and majorities, little if any attention has been devoted to diasporas. In the most widely read books on nationalism and ethnonationalism,¹ the phenomenon is not considered worthy of discussion, let alone index entries. This omission is not surprising, for through the ages, the Diaspora had a very specific meaning: the exile of the Jews from their historic homeland and their dispersion throughout many lands, signifying as well the oppression and moral degradation implied by that dispersion. But a unique phenomenon is not very useful for social scientists attempting to make generalizations. Today, “diaspora” and, more specifically, “diaspora community” seem increasingly to be used as metaphoric designations for several categories of people—expatriates, expellees, political refugees, alien residents, immigrants, and ethnic and racial minorities tout court—in much the same way that “ghetto” has come to designate all kinds of crowded, constricted, and disadvantaged urban environments, and “holocaust” has come to be applied to all kinds of mass murder.

Basing their studies on a fairly broad working definition of diaspora such as that of Walker Connor, “that segment of a people living outside the homeland” (16), scholars have applied the term to Cubans and Mexicans in the United States, Pakistanis in Britain, Maghrebis in France, Turks in Germany, Chinese communities in Southeast Asia, Greek and Polish minorities, Palestinian Arabs, blacks in North America and the Caribbean, Indians and Armenians in various countries, Corsicans in Marseilles, and even Flemish-speaking Belgians living in communal enclaves in Wallonia. Lest the term lose all meaning, I suggest that Connor’s definition be extended and that the concept of diaspora be applied to expatriate minority communities whose members share several of the following characteristics: 1) they, or their ancestors, have been dispersed from a specific original “center” to two or more “peripheral,” or foreign, regions; 2) they retain a collective memory, vision, or myth about their original homeland—its physical location, history, and achievements; 3) they believe that they are not—and perhaps cannot be—fully accepted by their host society and therefore feel partly alienated and insulated from it; 4) they regard their ancestral homeland as their true, ideal home and as the place to which they or their descendants would (or should) eventually return—when conditions are appropriate; 5) they believe that they should, collectively, be committed to the maintenance or restoration of their original homeland and to its safety and prosperity; and 6) they continue to relate, personally or vicariously, to that homeland in one way or another, and their ethnocommunal consciousness and solidarity are importantly defined by the existence of such a relationship. In terms of that definition, we may legitimately speak of the Armenian, Maghrebi, Turkish, Palestinian, Cuban, Greek, and perhaps Chinese diasporas at present and of the Polish diaspora of the past, although none of them fully conforms to the "ideal type" of the Jewish Diaspora.

2. Diasporas in Comparison

The Armenian diaspora condition resembles that of the Jews most closely. Armenian ethnicity and the solidarity of the Armenian community are based on a common religion and language, a collective memory of national independence in a circumscribed territory, and a remembrance of betrayal, persecution, and genocide. Like the majority of Jews, most Armenians live outside the ancestral homeland and have developed several external centers of religion and culture. Like Jews, Armenians have performed a middleman function in the host societies among which they lived; they have been high achievers, have been prominent in trade and commerce, and have made contributions to the science, culture, and modernization of the host society. They have had a clear orientation toward their community but have not chosen to live in ghettos. The fostering of the Armenian language has been important, but this has not prevented Armenians from being fully immersed in the language and culture of the host society. The church has played an important role in maintaining Armenian ethnicity, although there are two competing administrative centers of the Armenian church (with different degrees of ethnopolitical commitment), church attendance has been falling off, and the degree of religiousness has varied from active, even exclusive, preoccupation to indifference. One is born into the Armenian community, but one may leave it; exogamy is discouraged, but increasingly practiced; non-Armenians are regarded as "foreigners" (odars—the Armenian equivalent of goyim), but they are admitted, albeit selectively, into the community (O'Grady 76–81).

As in the case of Jews, there is among Armenians a continuum of ethnicity ranging from assimilationism to intense ethnopolitical mobilization (see Kirkland). The former has been found most frequently in the United States, Australia, Canada, and other "pluralistic" settler societies and is reflected in the Armenian Catholic church; the latter has tended to maintain itself in the Middle East, where communalistic and semiautonomous institutions were customary (e.g., the millet system of the Ottoman Empire), and is reflected in the Armenian Apostolic church. As in the case of Jews since the reestablishment of Israel, there is a controversy about whether there is indeed a place to return to—and whether, therefore, the diaspora can be ended. To be sure, there is an Armenian republic, but it is a severely truncated land—most of historic Armenia is in Turkey—and as a Soviet province has had neither genuine national independence nor even (at least until the era of glasnost) adequate autonomy to develop fully its traditional culture, which includes the Armenian variants of Christianity.

Historically, the Polish situation could be compared to that of Armenians and Jews. After the destruction of Polish independence, Polish national consciousness was perpetuated by Poles living under a variety of conditions. Between 1792 and 1918, both the Poles of Russian Poland and those of the Austrian province of Galicia maintained the Polish language and culture with variable success—the former clandestinely, the latter more openly; but these Poles had not been physically removed from their land and could not, therefore, be considered a diaspora. Diaspora would be equally inappropriate as a term to describe the condition of the Poles under German occupation and as inhabitants of a Soviet satellite country, under which they could be considered an oppressed nationality, as could the Hungarians in Transylvania, the Moldavians in the Soviet Union, and, indeed, the Palestinians in the Occupied Territories. However, the Poles who settled in France between the Polish insurrection of 1830 and the end of World War I (like the poets Mickiewicz and Slowacki), and many who fled Poland between 1939 and 1944, could be considered members of a genuine diaspora. They regarded themselves as temporary residents, were convinced that “Poland [is] not yet lost as long as we live,”² vowed to fight for the reestablishment of the Polish state, and meanwhile also acted as “fighting middlemen” in the service of the causes of their host countries. They established a variety of institutions, such as churches, schools, and journals, designed to maintain Polish culture and identity³ and during this period of their residency in France, for example, “many Poles considered it a sacrilege to speak French in their homes” (Malet 36). The diasporic dimension of the Polish nation was illustrated in a saying that made the rounds during World War II to the effect that Poland was the largest country in the world: its government was in London, its army was in Italy, and its population was in Siberia. It should be noted, however, that the mass of Polish immigrants who came to the United States after the 1880s were not a diaspora: they came to settle and to work; and most of their offspring readily intermarried and assimilated, no longer spoke Polish, and were not much concerned with the political fortunes of their progenitors’ homeland.

If the extended definition above is slightly attenuated, then the Maghrebi and Portuguese immigrés in France and the Turkish Gastarbeiter in Germany may be considered diasporas. Yet their condition differs markedly from that of the Jews and Armenians. Unlike these two latter, Maghrebis, Portuguese, and Turks were not forcibly expelled from their countries of origin, countries that (regardless of regime) have continued to exist in space and time. Therefore, neither group has had the political obligation, or the moral burden, of reconstituting a lost homeland or maintaining an endangered culture. Both the Maghrebis and the Portuguese are officially welcomed as two of many actual and potential elements of a societal melting pot and of a constantly evolving French nation; and, on the level of public authorities, efforts have been made to “insert” them into the French economic and political systems. (Jews and Armenians, too, have been officially welcomed as settlers in various societies at various times—for example, the former in fourteenth-century Poland and the latter in various regions of the eastern Mediterranean, but in both cases the places from which they departed were places of oppression).

Nevertheless, a diaspora consciousness is perpetuated in both the Maghrebi and Portuguese communities: many Maghrebis speak of a "fermeture relative du système politique national" and find assimilation impossible so long as francité is equated with European and Christian (or Judeo-Christian) origins and customs and so long as Islamic culture (no matter how secularized and diluted) is regarded as incompatible with it (Jazouli 37; see Club 54 et passim). That is why many French refer to even those Maghrebis who have forgotten most of their Arabic and who speak and write in French as "immigrés de la deuxième génération" or as Algerians,⁴ and in so doing reinforce the Maghrebis' diaspora consciousness.

The Portuguese immigrants fit much more comfortably into traditional French culture and society; yet in their case, too, a diaspora consciousness persists, though for different reasons: the relative physical proximity to the home country facilitates ongoing relationships with it, and the "underclass" condition of the Portuguese expatriates causes them to understate the poverty of the real Portugal and to develop a somewhat idealized image of a mystical Portugal and Portuguese civilization (Lusitanism) (Hily and Poinard 160–62).

The members of the Turkish community in Germany, though much more secularized in their behavior than their Maghrebi confreres in France, have a more highly developed diaspora consciousness. This is reflected in the results of a recent opinion poll, which revealed that 53% of the Turks were hoping to return to Turkey within the next few years and that only 5% were planning to remain in Germany permanently (Deutschland-Nachrichten 8). To some extent, this attitude represents an internalization of the "myth of return" (Heimkehrillusion) that is assiduously fostered by German elites and policymakers who fear an inundation of the country by foreigners (Überfremdung) and who insist that Germany is not a country of immigrants (Salt 167; Safran "Islamization"). The myth of return itself—and the diaspora consciousness with which it is associated—may be related to the very nature of German society, which has been traditionally defined "organically" rather than "functionally," that is, whose citizenship has tended to be based on descent rather than birth (or long residence) in the country.

Not all "dispersed" minority populations can legitimately be considered diasporas. Contrary to the opinion of Richard Marienstras, the Flemish-speaking Belgians who live in their own communities in Wallonia, surrounded by French speakers, or vice versa, are not, simply by virtue of their physical detachment from a particular linguistic center, a diaspora. They have not been exiled or expatriated, and their condition is the result of demographic changes around them. They are, in short, an enclave enjoying full linguistic autonomy and political equality. Similarly, the Magyars of Transylvania cannot be regarded as living in a diaspora. Despite the fact that (under the dictatorship of Ceausescu) they did not enjoy full cultural autonomy, the Magyars of Romania were not dispersed; rather, their communities were politically detached from the motherland.

The Gypsies are a truly dispersed and homeless people; their political powerlessness has rendered them subject to persecution and—under Nazi rule—to genocide. They may be regarded as constituting a classic diaspora in the sense that through however many generations they can trace their residence in a host country, they evince "the spirit of the first generation in the links they maintain with [their] traditional structures (Liégeois 142).

They are even a "metadiaspora" in their economic rootlessness: in their exclusion—largely, in effect, a self-exclusion—from the economic life of the host society, they represent the epitome of the Jewish Luftmensch of Eastern Europe. But their situation is not quite comparable to that of other diasporas: to a certain extent, their homelessness is a characteristic of their nomadic culture and the result of their refusal to be sedentarized. Moreover, diaspora consciousness is an intellectualization of an existential condition: the Gypsies have had social and economic grievances (see Liégeois), but they have not been asking themselves questions about "the Gypsy problem" in the way that the Jews have thought about a "Jewish problem," the Poles about a "Polish problem," and the Arabs about a "Palestinian problem." The Gypsies have had no myth of return because they have had no precise notion of their place of origin, no clear geographical focus, and no history of national sovereignty. The absence of such a myth might be a consequence also of the absence of Gypsy (Sinti or Romani) schools even in areas of heavy Gypsy concentration, and (in view of the social structure of Gypsy communities) the absence of a Gypsy intellectual elite that would articulate demands for such schools. All this may explain why at a world Gypsy congress held in 1978 there was an emphasis on overcoming negative images of Gypsies and on ending discrimination in housing and health, but there were no references to an original homeland (Puxon 5–6; 13–14).

In several respects, the Palestinian⁵ diaspora resembles the Jewish and Armenian ones. Hundreds of thousands of Arab residents of what became the state of Israel were expelled, encouraged to flee, or impelled by conditions of hostility to leave. They have memories of their homeland; their descendants cultivate a collective myth about it; and their ethnic communal consciousness is increasingly defined by—and their political mobilization has centered around—the desire to return to that homeland. There is a network of institutions in Middle Eastern, West European, and North American countries that serve émigré Palestinians and a variety of journals that foster a continuing identification with the homeland. Indeed, PLO leader Yasir Arafat may be said to personify the Palestinian diaspora: he has no permanent home or office address, and he has been moving from one Arab capital to another (see Ibrahim).

Arguably, not all the Palestinians living outside Israel or pre-1948 Palestine constitute a genuine diaspora. Like the Sudeten and Silesian Germans who fled or were expelled from Czechoslovakia and Poland and who settled in the German Federal Republic, and unlike the Jews or the Armenians, the vast majority of Palestinians (i.e., those who have not emigrated to the United States or Western Europe) do not live altogether as "strangers in strange lands": in Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon, they live within the territory of the "Arab nation" (al umma 'al 'arabiyya). They may be deprived of political rights whether they live in conditions of impoverishment (as in the refugee camps in the Gaza Strip) or hold well-paid jobs and live in relative comfort, as until recently in Kuwait. Yet they have not had to make the kinds of cultural or linguistic sacrifices characteristic of other diasporas: they continue to speak their language and practice their religion. It is true that there were numerous village traditions that set the Palestinians apart from the inhabitants of Syria; still, dislocation from one's native village—with its own ambience, traditions, and local dialect—does not automatically bring about a diaspora condition; if it did, a population that moved from a village in France to a place in francophone Belgium—and, indeed, many of the inhabitants of modern countries marked by geographical mobility—would have to be considered as living in a diaspora.

Half the Palestinians (i.e., those who live outside of the kingdom of Jordan) do not live in a sovereign state with a Palestinian majority, and many Palestinians do not live in an Arab state at all; however, the absence of political sovereignty (or self-determination) does not constitute ipso facto a diaspora condition; in fact, before the establishment of Israel, Palestinians in Transjordan and in what (since 1949) has been called the “West Bank” did not regard themselves as living in a diaspora (see Al-Shuaibi). Moreover, there is a great deal of disagreement about the exact territorial dimensions of the Palestinian homeland.⁶ Regardless of these uncertainties, both the physical fact of a growing Palestinian diaspora and a collective diaspora consciousness cannot be denied; and while that consciousness may be diluted in the case of relatively prosperous Palestinians who have settled in Western countries, it is strongly perpetuated among the children of refugees and expellees.

In a physical sense, it is possible to speak of a Corsican diaspora; well over half of those who acknowledge their Corsican ethnicity as a continuing aspect of their being live outside the island, most of them concentrated in the Marseilles area. Many Corsicans (including those who no longer speak the Corsican language) continue to be involved in their homeland by keeping their names on the electoral registers of the island's communes and by returning there regularly to vote (Safran “Mitterrand” 48–49).

The consciousness of diaspora is particularly strong among those Corsicans who have found their social and economic adjustment to mainland conditions difficult; to them, Corsitude reflects a “mythification of the past,” and to be Corsican is to be part of a “magical-religious world” that cannot be found on the French mainland (Dressler-Holohan 81, 84). And regardless of how often these mainland Corsicans visit their native island, they preserve an idealized image of the Corsican village which, although far from perfect, is a place “where one can take off one's mask” (85). (This attitude is quite similar to the romanticization of the East European shtetl by third-generation American Jews [see Zborowski and Herzog]—except that what is being idealized in the latter case is not a “homeland” but a “primary diaspora.”) Such a diaspora consciousness does not affect most of the third-generation Corsicans who have become embourgeoisé. To them, Corsica is merely part of metropolitan France.

The Indian diaspora is a genuine one in several respects: its spread across three continents, its long history, its auxiliary (or middleman) role within host societies, and the varying attitudes of its members—ranging from integrationist to particularist. But the Indian diaspora differs in important ways from that of the Jews and Armenians: an Indian homeland has existed continuously, that homeland has not been noted for encouraging an “ingathering” (see Helweg), and Indian diaspora status has not always been associated with political disability or even minority status. The homeland myth is not particularly operative where the Indian diaspora is in the majority (as in Fiji) or where it constitutes a large, well-established, and sometimes dominant minority (as in Trinidad and Tobago, Nepal, Guyana, and Sri Lanka).

The diaspora of the Parsis is in several respects comparable to that of the Jews: its members have been held together by a common religion, and they have engaged in commerce and the free professions, have been pioneers in industrial innovation, and have performed various useful services to the ruling class. Like the Jews, the Parsis have been loyal to the government. But unlike the Jews, they are not widely dispersed but concentrated in a single area—the Bombay region of India. Moreover, they have no myth of return to their original homeland, Iran, whence they emigrated in the eighth century. The weakness of the Parsis' "homeland" consciousness can be attributed in part to the caste system of India and the relatively tolerant attitudes of Hinduism, both of which made for a greater acceptance of social and ethnocultural segmentation and made Parsis feel less "exceptional" (see Zenner).

The far-flung Chinese expatriate communities also constitute genuine diasporas. They have shared the cultural preoccupations of the Jewish and Armenian minority communities in their efforts at maintaining a variety of communal institutions; and like Armenians in Asia Minor, Jews in Poland, and Indians in South Africa, they have been identified with "pariah capitalism" in that they have functioned as intermediaries between the subsistence agriculture of the native majority and the more commercial and industrial concerns of foreign countries and of a part of the domestic elite (see Chun). The Chinese, however, have always been able to return to a homeland that was politically independent and in which their culture predominated and flourished. In fact, many of the Chinese in Southeast Asia were motivated by the desire "to make enough money . . . to bring it back with them to their homeland" (Chun 235). However, the homeland myth—and with it, diaspora consciousness—has been attenuated in several locations, but for opposite reasons: where legal and political disabilities have been removed and economic opportunities have expanded, so that the knowledge of the Chinese language and the connection with Chinese culture have become weak (as, increasingly, in the United States and Canada); and where the Chinese community has become so dominant that it has been able to secure an institutionally guaranteed status for its culture—in effect, to recreate a Chinese community outside the original homeland, but with more appealing political and economic conditions (as in Singapore). It is interesting to note that after the end of the war in Vietnam, many ethnic Chinese, while perhaps continuing to maintain a homeland myth, did not go "home"; instead, they went from a less attractive diaspora to a more attractive one. They went from Indochina to France or the United States—just as many dissatisfied Jews went from the Soviet Union to North America or Western Europe, instead of Israel, and many blacks went from the West Indies to the United States or Britain, instead of Africa.

In recent years, the black communities of the Americas have increasingly been referred to as diasporas. Like the Jews and Armenians, black Africans had been victimized by imperialism, forcibly uprooted from their homelands, and dispersed, only to be subjected to disabilities and persecutions in their host societies (see Skinner). Like Jews and Armenians, American blacks have a homeland myth, but—in contrast to that of more recent black immigrants to France—it can no longer be precisely focused. For this reason, African “Zionist” efforts have not been successful and have not gone beyond the “repatriation” of several hundred blacks from the United States, the West Indies, and England to Sierra Leone in the eighteenth century and the settlement of small groups of American blacks in Liberia in the nineteenth century. Furthermore, American blacks no longer have a clearly defined African cultural heritage to preserve. For these reasons, American blacks attempting to maintain—and rationalize—their ethn racial distinctiveness (and their status as a diaspora) have seen the need to create a culture that is different from that of the majority; however, some elements of that culture, such as “Black English,” have low prestige and impede social mobility, whereas others, such as “Black Islam,” have been artificial grafts lacking a convincing connection with black experience. (To some extent, “Black English” is comparable to Yiddish, which, as the idiom of a closed and impoverished society, was held in low esteem—on the one hand by those who favored Hebrew because it was the language of the homeland focus, and on the other hand by those who had adjusted to an “improved” diaspora and who favored the language of the host society.)

Since a specific homeland cannot be restored to American blacks, their homeland myth is translated into solidarity with African liberation struggles and the support of a variety of the aspirations of the sub-Saharan black states, including the fight against apartheid in South Africa and demands for increased economic aid to African nations. It is further translated into a general support of the Third World.

The Hispanic (or Latino) community in the United States has not generally been considered a diaspora. The Mexican Americans, the largest component of that community, are either descendants of those who had settled in what is now the United States before the arrival of the Anglos or (first- or second-generation) immigrants from Mexico who came in search of a better future. Although subject to periodic discrimination, they are assimilating at a steady pace. While they occasionally deplore the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo under which, in 1848, Mexico was forced to cede territory to the United States, celebrate Mexican folk festivals, and maintain contact with relatives left behind, Mexican Americans do not cultivate a homeland myth (see Garza)—perhaps because the homeland cannot be easily idealized. The poverty and political corruption of Mexico (which is easy enough to observe, given the proximity of that country) stand in too sharp a contrast with conditions in the United States.

There is, however, a Cuban diaspora. Half of the 800,000 (mostly middle-class) Cubans who left their island, voluntarily or forcibly, after the installation of the Castro government found refuge in the nearby Miami area. They kept alive the hope of returning to their homeland as soon as the Castro regime was overthrown and initially resisted the idea of giving up their Cuban citizenship. However, their experience with the Batista regime is too recent to serve as a prototype of a democratic Cuba that might be constituted after the replacement of Castro. Moreover, as time passes, the Castro regime endures, and as Cubans become more involved in United States politics, the myth of return becomes attenuated with the second generation (see Pedraza-Bailey; Portes and Mozo).

3. The Operative Aspect of the Homeland Myth: A Triangular Relationship

In an old Jewish joke from an Eastern European shtetl, the husband asks his wife: "What will happen to the million zloty I invested in the business if the Messiah comes, and we have to leave everything behind?" And the wife answers: "With God's help, the Messiah will not come so soon."

A cartoon appeared in Le Monde several years ago, showing an old man who says: "I have never lost hope of returning to my homeland some day. However, I no longer remember where I came from."

Some diasporas persist—and their members do not go “home”—because there is no homeland to which to return; because, although a homeland may exist, it is not a welcoming place with which they can identify politically, ideologically, or socially; or because it would be too inconvenient and disruptive, if not traumatic, to leave the diaspora. In the meantime, the myth of return serves to solidify ethnic consciousness and solidarity when religion can no longer do so, when the cohesiveness of the local community is loosened, and when the family is threatened with disintegration.

For many strictly religious Jews of Eastern Europe, the homeland myth was devoid of practical consequence, not only because until the nineteenth century the Holy Land was not open to mass resettlement but, more important, because any physical return before the advent of the Messiah would be considered anathema. For many secular (Yiddish-speaking) Jews of Eastern Europe the homeland myth was displaced by a striving for communal autonomy within the diaspora. By contrast, among American Jews who were neither religious nor Yiddish-speaking the homeland myth was not a powerful force because they lived in a settler country that defined membership in the political community in functional rather than organic terms. The myth took on real meaning to many American Jews after World War II—in part because it helped them to assuage their feelings of guilt for not having done enough to save their brethren in the European diaspora. At the same time, American Jews defined their diaspora in theologically “neutral” terms, that is, as a purely physical dispersion (golah), in opposition to much of the Israeli political leadership, which continued to think of Diaspora in terms of its traditional associations with moral degradation, insecurity, and persecution (galut).

There are Jews—including religiously observant ones—who argue that with the establishment of Israel the Diaspora in the purely theological sense has been brought to an end, although the physical (and voluntary) dispersion of Jews may be continuing (see Cohen 184ff). There are others, however, who believe that, in a sociopsychological sense, the diaspora has not ended, because the state of Israel is itself in a “diaspora” condition globally to the extent that it is treated as a pariah state by international organizations and regarded as not even “belonging” to the region in which it is located. This may be a questionable metaphorical use of the term; it does, however, serve to fortify the sympathies of the physical diaspora for the homeland community.

While the homeland myth exists, however, it is exploited for a variety of political and social purposes by the diaspora, the homeland, and the host society. This “triangular relationship”—alluded to by Sheffer but not subjected to a comparative analysis (1–15)—has interesting implications for majority-minority relations and has political consequences that may be both advantageous and disadvantageous for the diaspora.

Members of diaspora communities are by turns mistreated by the host country as “strangers within the gates” or welcomed or exploited for the sake of the domestic and diplomatic interests of the host country. Internal social unity has on some occasions required that minorities be kept as diasporas. Thus the persistence of the Jewish diaspora was for generations a convenient and even necessary element of Christian theology: the “wandering Jew” provided daily proof of the superiority of the Christian faith, on which Western societies were based. This was the obverse of the Jews’ own post hoc theological rationalization for their diaspora condition: the belief (reaffirmed by the devout in their daily prayers) that they had been exiled from their land as a collective punishment for their sins (which, in the eyes of the Jews, did not include deicide). The members of the Armenian diaspora have been spared a general demonization; the slave, and later free, members of the black diaspora may have been stigmatized according to certain biblical interpretations and, in more modern times, according to pseudo-scientific genetic criteria; and the Palestinians are often stigmatized collectively as terrorists par excellence. However, the members of these diasporas have not castigated themselves in the same manner as have the Jews. On the contrary, their diaspora conditions have been attributed to the sins of others: the cruelties of the Ottoman Turks, the greed of American colonists, and the duplicity of the British, the Americans, and the Zionists. Conversely, there are Christian fundamentalists who have theological motivations for putting an end to the Jewish diaspora: the conviction that the Jews’ return to the Holy Land would expedite the Second Coming of Christ.

Sometimes the interest of internal unity requires that minority group relations with a (potential or actual) homeland be disrupted—in effect, that the diaspora character of a minority be ended. This approach was reflected in France during the era of the Revolution and Napoleon, when the “Jewish nation” was transformed into a mere religious cult. It was also reflected in the Soviet Union in the 1920s when the authorities began to use the Cyrillic alphabet for the Turkish languages spoken within their country, in order to differentiate them (and their speakers) from the language spoken in Turkey, for which Kemal had just introduced the Latin script (see Lewis 217ff); again after World War II when the Cyrillic alphabet was used for the language spoken in the Moldavian Soviet Republic, in order to distinguish its speakers from the Romanians west of the Prut river; and when the use of Hebrew was banned and words of Hebrew origin in Yiddish were spelled phonetically so that the connection of the language with Zionism would be obscured.

Sometimes the host country finds it useful to emphasize and strengthen diaspora sentiments. This was done in France during the 1920s and 1930s when the Ministry of Public Instruction ordained that the children of Polish workers be instructed in the Polish language; in Germany in the 1930s, when (for purposes of scapegoating) the Nazis denaturalized Jewish citizens, thereby transforming most of them into Zionists; in the United States during the 1950s, when politicians stressed the diaspora aspect of Latvian and other immigrants from the "captive nations," in order to delegitimize the postwar incorporation of Baltic lands into the Soviet Union, and during the 1960s, when the Cuban immigrants' homeland sentiments were fanned for the purpose of recruiting them for the fight against Castro; by Arab governments since the 1960s, when they helped foster a diaspora consciousness among Palestinian Arabs in order to mobilize them against Israel;⁷ and by German authorities at present, when they emphasize the provisional character of the Turkish workers' residence in order to increase the latter's incentive to return to their homeland.

Occasionally, a minority's interest in its homeland is stimulated for the sake of the promotion of a foreign-policy goal and ignored later when the direction of foreign policy has altered. This occurred when the United States at the end of World War I made grandiose promises to Armenians in the United States of an independent Armenia in eastern Anatolia—in order to weaken the Ottoman Empire, only to lose interest after the war as a result of a growing rapprochement with Turkey (Lang and Walker 2). It occurred also during World War II, when the British encouraged the formation of a Polish brigade to fight for a free Poland, only to sacrifice that aim in the interest of a postwar accommodation with the Soviet Union.

Diaspora sentiments may be manipulated by the government of the host country in order to influence the behavior of the homeland. United States government officials attempted on several occasions (especially during the presidency of Jimmy Carter) to have American Jews exert pressure on Israel; and during the post-World War II period, the Soviet Union cultivated the fear among Turks that it would someday use Armenian claims to eastern Anatolia as a lever for further Russian expansion at the expense of Turkey (Matossian 194–95).

Conversely, a "homeland" government may exploit diaspora sentiments for its purposes. Early in the twentieth century, Sun Yat-sen solicited support among overseas Chinese in his efforts at overthrowing the Ch'ing dynasty; later, the Nazis manipulated the Sudeten Germans and the Volksdeutsche in other parts of Eastern Europe to promote German territorial expansion and tried (without success) to have German Americans exert pressure on the United States government to stay out of World War II. The Greek government has attempted to use the Greek diaspora in the United States to lobby against Turkey; the Israeli government has used American Jewish leaders as interlocutors for the promotion of pro-Israeli policies; and France under de Gaulle attempted to use the francophone "diaspora" in Quebec to promote French cultural influence (and, incidentally, to annoy the "Anglo-Saxons"). Some factions of the PLO, representing (inter alia) one diaspora, the Palestinian, have tried to enlist the support of a second diaspora, the Armenian, against the homeland of a third diaspora, the Jewish. Finally, diasporas have expressed their sentiments spontaneously, in the form of general political support and remittances that are sent to Algeria, Greece, Israel, Mexico, and other homelands.

While the homelands are grateful for that support, they view the diaspora with a certain disdain for having been enticed by the fleshpots of capitalism and for retaining a vulgarized ethnic culture. This is among the reasons why homelands do not necessarily want to welcome their diasporas back from abroad. Returnees, particularly from host countries that are more advanced than the homeland, might unsettle its political, social, and economic equilibrium; returning Maghrebis, Mexicans, and Turks might be too ambitious and too demanding politically; blacks too Americanized; and Armenians too capitalist. Palestinian Arabs returning to Jordan from abroad might pose a threat to the throne (and life) of King Hussein. Even Israel (despite the Law of Return) is somewhat ambivalent about a massive influx of Soviet or American Jews—the former, because of the problem of integrating them professionally, and the latter, because they are too “Anglo-Saxon.”

The homeland myth plays a role in the political behavior of diasporas and is reflected both in voting and in interdiaspora relations. In France, Maghrebi-Jewish relations are complicated by the Arab-Israeli conflict; in the United States, black support of the Arab cause has translated itself into hostility toward Jews (though, to be sure, that hostility has multiple determinants); and in both countries diaspora Armenians, despite their capitalist outlook, have been positively inclined to the Soviet Union (for harboring the only Armenian political entity) (see Szaz). In France, many Jews have voted for the Socialist party because of its more favorable attitude toward Israel, and one may assume that if in the future there is Maghrebi bloc voting it would benefit the Gaullist party for the opposite reason. In Britain, many Pakistanis voted for the Conservative party because of Mrs. Thatcher's anti-Soviet attitudes; and in the United States, Cubans, ethnics of East European origin, and (increasingly) Jews have voted for the Republican party because of its reputation for a tougher stand against Communism. Sometimes, the interest of the diaspora in the domestic affairs of the homeland takes the form of direct political interference, as, for example, the interference of the leaders of the Lubavitch Hasidic sect in Brooklyn in the politics of Israeli coalition formation.

In sum, both diaspora consciousness and the exploitation of the homeland myth by the homeland itself are reflected not so much in instrumental as in expressive behavior. It is a defense mechanism against slights committed by the host country against the minority, but it does not—and is not intended to—lead its members to prepare for the actual departure for the homeland. The “return” of most diasporas (much like the Second Coming or the next world) can thus be seen as a largely eschatological concept: it is used to make life more tolerable by holding out a utopia—or eutopia—that stands in contrast to the perceived dystopia in which actual life is lived.

The problem of diaspora/host country/homeland relationships—and, indeed, the very definition of diaspora—goes beyond the purely ethnic, genetic, and emotional. Devout Roman Catholics who live in largely Protestant countries may see themselves as living in a religious diaspora and look to Rome as their spiritual homeland. Catalans of Perpignan, who may be patriotic French citizens, may regard Barcelona as their cultural and linguistic homeland; and the German-speaking Swiss may locate the Germanic cultural center somewhere in Germany and view themselves as living in a “dispersed” or peripheral Kulturgebiet. For French and Italian Stalinists, the “hieratic” homeland was, for many years, Moscow, and they may have seen themselves as living in an ideological diaspora. For multinational corporations—and their executives—the economic diaspora may be constantly changing, and the homeland may be functionally defined: ubi lucrum, ibi patria. The complex and flexible positioning of ethnic diasporas between host countries and homelands thus constitutes a prototype for various sets of coordinates that social units and individuals use for defining, centering, and (if necessary) “delocalizing” their activities and identities, and that social scientists may use in analyzing the relationship between “insiders” and “outsiders” and between state and society.

4. Conclusion: Open Questions and a Research Agenda for the Future

There are a number of questions concerning the diaspora phenomenon to which we can only allude and whose detailed examination is beyond the scope of this essay.

1. To what social category and in what typological schema does the diaspora belong? Where is it to be placed on the continuum that begins with those who belong to amorphous majorities and ends with strangers and interlopers?

2. What criteria is one to choose to distinguish between one diaspora community and another—for example, between Minsk and Birobidzhan in the Soviet Union or between Soviet and American Jewish diasporas? between the Armenian diasporas in Lebanon, in Jerusalem, in Paris, and in California? between the Chinese diasporas in Singapore and in the United States?

3. Is it useful to emphasize the developmental and cultural dichotomies that exist between country of origin and host country in order to explain the attitudes and behavior patterns of diaspora communities?

4. Do the various diaspora communities—Armenian, black, Chinese, Jewish, Maghrebi, and Palestinian—behave differently toward one another than do nondiaspora minority communities? What are the crucial elements in interdiaspora relations and what are their determinants? And is it possible to draw conclusions from them that are valid for interethnic relations in general?

5. How long does it take for a diaspora consciousness to develop, and what are the necessary and sufficient conditions for its survival? Does such consciousness weaken with the passage of decades or centuries, as the relationship with the real homeland is lost, or, conversely, does the homeland focus become more deeply embedded in the collective consciousness of a minority as concrete experience is replaced by myth? What factors or conditions—for example, language, religion, relative deprivation, and political disabilities—are necessary or sufficient for the maintenance of a homeland myth?

6. Is there an ideal type of relationship between country of origin and diaspora community that is contingent on their respective roles? And under what conditions are these roles inverted?

7. What is the connection between a “millenarian” approach to country of origin and concrete action? For example, does the Jews’ myth of a return to their homeland “at the end of days” serve to encourage them to anticipate the event by settling in Israel, or does it weaken their will to do so? Conversely, does the secularization of Zionism undermine the religiosity of Jews and therefore their ethnic unity? Does the decline of religious practice among Armenians weaken their ethnic consciousness, or, on the contrary, does it cause them to look for a territorial focus as a replacement for a lost faith? Does the weakening of religious practice among the Maghrebis in France compromise their myth of an ultimate return to their country of origin or, on the contrary, does it cause them to emphasize their "Arabness" (arabité) and therefore to maintain a homeland myth?

8. In the relationship between perceptions of discrimination, actual oppression, and diaspora sentiments, which are the independent and which the dependent variables? Is there a reciprocal causality? Is diaspora consciousness a concomitant of a feeling of otherness, of alienation, or of a lack of hospitality on the part of the host society; or, on the contrary, is the lack of hospitality a response by the host society to the exceptionalism that diaspora consciousness signifies? Is the exceptionalism of the diaspora a response to the very nature of the host society—of its culture, its behavior, and its dominant ideology, including a monistic approach to the definition of membership in the political community?

9. More specifically, is the diaspora consciousness of an immigrant community more likely to develop in countries whose citizenship criteria are based on jus sanguinis (e.g., Germany and Switzerland) and less likely to maintain itself in "settler" countries informed by jus soli (e.g., the United States, Canada, Australia, and [to a lesser extent] France)? Or, on the contrary, does the institutional and ideological pluralism that exists in the latter countries alleviate the pressures against the expression of diaspora sentiments?

10. To what extent is diaspora consciousness a function of the degree of structural "normality" of the minority community? Is such consciousness likely to be sharpened by a divergence of the minority community from the "normal" social-occupational pyramid (i.e., one in which there are masses of landowning peasants at the bottom, a sizable industrial working class in the middle, and a small bourgeoisie farther up the social scale)? And to the extent that such a norm no longer applies in "postindustrial" societies, may one project a weakening of diaspora consciousness in them?

11. Does the diaspora community function as a better scapegoat than an indigenous minority or an immigrant ethnic community that no longer has any links—mythic or real—with its country of origin? History seems to suggest that there is no difference: neither the American blacks (before the Civil War) nor the European Gypsies (during World War II) had a "home country"; but that fact did not prevent the former from being reduced to slavery and the latter from being persecuted and annihilated. Because of the existence of a large number of assertive and economically important Muslim states, it is highly improbable that the Maghrebis in France, though often made a scapegoat for unemployment and crimes of violence, would be forcibly expelled or that the Turkish diaspora in Germany would be subjected to a "final solution"; because of the existence of a populous and influential Chinese state, it is highly improbable that the members of the Chinese diaspora in various countries would be subjected to a similar fate; and it may be argued that the Jews would have been less likely to be victimized if a Jewish state had existed before 1948.

12. What are the implications of the diaspora phenomenon for public policy? More precisely, how should the government of a host country conduct itself vis-à-vis its diaspora communities? What links with their home countries should it allow? Should it discourage all cultural or organizational expression of diaspora sentiment for the sake of a rigid definition of membership in the “nation-state”? Or should it encourage such expression as a politically innocuous—and socially perhaps even useful—manifestation of a subpolitical identity? Should there be a new approach to citizenship that would distinguish it from nationality and that would accept as “normal” a diversity of cultural orientations, emotional identifications, language practices, and extraterritorial interest without these being regarded as proof of political disloyalty? Attempts to answer these questions may reveal that diaspora communities pose a more serious challenge to host societies than do other minority communities: they test the efficacy of the process of integration and the outer limits of freedom of consciousness and, finally, the limits of pluralism.

Notes

This article is a revised and much enlarged version of a paper presented at the Université de Haute Bretagne, Rennes, France, in December 1988. The earlier version was published in Les Etrangers dans la ville, ed. Ida Simon and Jean-Pierre Simon (Paris: L'Harmattan, 1990). I also wish to thank two anonymous reviewers for their comments and suggestions, from which this version has benefited greatly.

1. For example, see Cobban; Shafer; Smith; Rothschild; and Enloe.
2. “Jeszcze Polska nie zginieła kiedy my żyjemy”—these are still the words of the Polish national anthem, which parallel those of “Hatikva,” the Zionist and, later, Israeli national anthem: “As long as there is a Jewish soul within us . . . our eyes turn to Zion.”
3. For an “inventory” of the Polish diaspora and its institutions, see Kolodziej, whose study was published under the auspices of the Cracow-based Institute for the Study of Poles Abroad.
4. See Morsy (15ff), who points out that this label is often used even for third-generation descendants of Algerian immigrants.
5. The term “Palestinian Arab” is preferred by some Israeli Jews, especially those of the older generation who remember that the term “Palestinian” was applied to the Jewish as well as the Arab inhabitants of Mandate Palestine. In Britain, the major fundraising agency in behalf of the Jewish settlers used to be called the United Palestine Appeal, and the Jerusalem Post, the English-language daily of the Jews in Israel, was, until 1948, known as the Palestine Post.
6. According to one sympathetic observer of the Palestinian condition, the focus of the Palestinians’ homeland aspirations would not be Haifa (or the rest of Israel within the pre-1967 borders), “as a first step at least” (Colin Smith 5).
7. According to Zuheir Mohsen, head of the Saiqa faction of the PLO, “There are no differences between Jordanians, Palestinians, Syrians, and Lebanese. . . . It is only for political reasons that we carefully underline our Palestinian identity.” Saiqa is backed by the Syrian government.

Works Cited

Al-Shuaibi, Issa. “The Development of Palestinian Entity-Consciousness.” Pt. 1. Journal of Palestinian Studies 9 (1979): 67–84.

- Chun, Allen J. "Pariah Capitalism and the Overseas Chinese of Southeast Asia: Problems in the Definition of the Problem." Ethnic and Racial Studies 12 (1989): 233-56.
- Club de l'Horloge. L'Identité de la France. Paris: Albin Michel, 1985.
- Cobban, Alfred. The Nation State and National Self-Determination. New York: Crowell, 1969.
- Cohen, Arthur A. The Natural and the Supernatural Jew. 2nd rev. ed. New York: Behrman, 1979.
- Connor, Walker. "The Impact of Homelands Upon Diasporas." Sheffer 16-46.
- Deutschland-Nachrichten*. 27 Jan. 1988: 1-8.
- Dressler-Holohan, Wanda. "Etre Corse en diaspora." La France au pluriel? Ed. Centre des Relations Internationales et de Sciences Politiques D'Amiens. Paris: L'Harmattan, 1984. 81-89.
- Enloe, Cynthia. Ethnic Conflict and Political Development. Boston: Little, 1973.
- Garza, Rodolfo de la. "As American as Tamale Pie: Mexican-American Political Mobilization and the Loyalty Question." Mexican-Americans in Comparative Perspective. Ed. Walker Connor. Washington: Urban Inst., 1985. 227-42.
- Helweg, Arthur W. "The Indian Diaspora: Influence on International Relations." Sheffer 103-29.
- Hily, Marie-Antoinette, and Michel Poinard. "Les jeunes et la dynamique associative portugaise." Généralisations issues de l'immigration. Ed. Georges Abou-Sada and Hélène Milet. Paris: Arcantère, 1986. 155-67.
- Ibrahim, Youssef M. "For Palestinians, P.L.O. Is a Homeland of the Mind." New York Times, 20 March 1988, sec. 4: 4.
- Jazouli, Adil. "Les Maghrébins de France à la croisée des chemins." Combat pour la Diaspora 15 (3e trimestre 1984): 31-38.
- Kirkland, James M. "Maintenance of Armenian Identity and Ethnicity in Australia." Ethnic Groups 4.4 (1981): 255-94.
- Kolodziej, Edward. Emigracja z ziem polskich i Polonia 1865-1939. Cracow: Nakladem Uniwersytetu Jagiellonskiego, 1988.
- Lang, David Marshall, and Christopher Walker. The Armenians. Rept. 32, 5th ed. Minority Rights Group: London, 1981.
- Lewis, E. G. Multilingualism in the Soviet Union. The Hague: Mouton, 1972.
- Liégeois, Jean-Pierre. "Une minorité entre l'image et la réalité: l'expérience tsigane." Actes du colloque Diversité culturelle, société industrielle, état national. Ed. Gilles Verbunt. Paris: L'Harmattan, 1984. 135-45.
- Malet, Emile. Adresse sur l'immigration aux bonnes âmes de droite et aux belles consciences de gauche. Paris: Joseph Clims, 1987.
- Marienstrass, Richard. "Sur la notion de la diaspora." Les minorités à l'âge de l'état-nation. Ed. Gérard Chaliand. Paris: Fayard, 1985. 215-26.
- Matossian, Mary Kilburn. "Communist Rule and the Changing Armenian Cultural Pattern." Ethnic Minorities in the Soviet Union. Ed. Erich Goldhagen. New York: Praeger, 1968.
- Mohsen, Zuheir. Interview with James Dorsey. Trouw 31 Mar. 1977.

Myths of Homeland and Return

Morsy, Magali. Les Nord-Africains en France. Paris: Centre des Hautes Etudes sur L'Afrique et l'Asie Modernes, 1984.

O'Grady, Ingrid. "Shared Meaning and Choice as Components of Armenian Immigration Adaptation." Anthropological Quarterly 54 (1981): 76–81.

Pedraza-Bailey, Silvia. "Cuba's Exiles: Portrait of a Refugee Migration." International Migration Review 19 (1985): 4–34.

Portes, Alejandro, and Rafael Mozo. "The Political Adaptation Process of Cubans and Other Ethnic Minorities in the United States." International Migration Review 19 (1985): 35–63.

Puxon, Gratton. Roma: Europe's Gypsies. Rept. 14, 3rd ed. London: Minority Rights Group, 1980.

Rothschild, Joseph. Ethnopolitics. New York: Columbia UP, 1981.

Safran, William. "Islamization in Western Europe: Political Consequences and Historical Parallels." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science 485 (1986): 98–112.

———. "The Mitterrand Regime and Its Policies of Ethnocultural Accommodation." Comparative Politics 18 (1985): 41–63.

Salt, John. "West German Dilemma: Little Turks or Young Germans?" Geography 70 (1985): 162–68.

Shafer, Boyd C. Nationalism: Myth and Reality. New York: Harcourt, 1955.

Sheffer, Gabriel, ed. Modern Diasporas in International Politics. New York: St. Martin's, 1986.

Skinner, Elliott P. "The Dialectic between Diasporas and Homelands." Global Dimensions of the African Diaspora. Ed. Joseph E. Harris. Washington: Howard UP, 1982. 17–45.

Smith, Anthony D. Theories of Nationalism. New York: Harper, 1971.

Smith, Colin. The Palestinians. Rept. 24, 4th ed. London: Minority Rights Group, 1982.

Szaz, Z. Michael. "Armenian Terrorists and the East-West Conflict." Journal of Social, Political, and Economic Studies 8 (1983): 387–94.

Zborowski, Mark, and Elizabeth Herzog. Life is with People: The Jewish Little Town of Eastern Europe. New York: Intl. Universities, 1952.

Zenner, Walter P. "The Jewish Diaspora and the Middleman Adaptation." Diaspora: Exile and the Contemporary Jewish Condition. Ed. Etan Levine. New York: Steimatzky, 1986. 117–23.